Between them, Graham Comerford and Martin Reilly have a wealth of experience ranging from software development, digital audio, graphic design and touch-screen technologies, and it was with this collaboration of skills that led to the establishment of ScreenForge Ltd.

Specialising in the music production industry Graham and Martin, through ScreenForge have used their specialist skills to identify a lucrative market niche in the realms of the professional music production industry.

There first product, called Yeco, was a sophisticated touch-screen controller that complimented an existing software music sequencer and Graham and Martin made the very shrewd move of releasing a demonstration version of Yeco online which resulted in over 10,000 downloads and numerous enquiries from professional music producers all over the world.

Martin and Graham entered Yeco into the national competition Ireland's Best Young Entrepreneur (IBYE) and won the Kilkenny county award in the "Best Start Up" category. This accolade highlights both the quality of the product as well as the business acumen of the two young entrepreneurs.

Local Enterprise Office Kilkenny supported ScreenForge with a Priming Grant to assist with the development of Yeco.

The first official version of Yeco has been met with praise and plaudits from all segments of the music production industry and Graham and Martin continue to use feedback and user experience comments to upgrade and further develop their product on a regular basis.

This positivity from industry veterans has assisted in propelling ScreenForge, who now use the name of their brainchild Yeco as their trading name, into the position that will enable Graham and Martin to reach their vision of making Yeco the market leader in touch controllers for the professional music production industry.

There is no doubt that we will hear more about Yeco and their innovative products in the future.
